

Harper's Rainbow Garden

Kelly meghan Coetzee

Harper put on her bright yellow rain boots and skipped out into the sunny backyard. She loved exploring every corner of the garden, looking for tiny treasures hidden in the grass.

Under a large oak leaf, Harper discovered a small, shimmering packet labeled Sparkle Seeds. Her eyes widened with wonder as she imagined what kind of magical plants might grow from them.

With her trusty blue watering can, Harper carefully planted the seeds in a sunny patch of soil. She hummed a happy tune, giving each seed a gentle drink of water and a little pat of dirt.

The next morning, Harper ran outside to find a forest of giant, glowing flowers taller than her head. The petals were every color of the rainbow and smelled like sweet strawberries and warm sunshine.

A friendly red ladybug landed on Harper's nose before fluttering toward a path made of smooth, flat stones. Harper giggled and followed her new friend deeper into the magical floral forest.

She reached a clearing where a magnificent butterfly with wings like stained glass was resting. When Harper waved, the butterfly danced through the air, leaving a trail of glittery dust behind.

In the heart of the garden, the flowers began to sway and hum a soft, rhythmic melody. Harper sat on a soft mossy rug and listened to the peaceful music of the wind and the blossoms.

A tiny, fuzzy bumblebee buzzed over to see what was happening in the clearing. Harper shared a piece of her apple, and the bee did a little thank you dance before flying back to its hive.

As the sun began to set, the sky turned shades of soft pink and deep orange. The magical flowers started to glow softly, lighting the way back to Harper's cozy house like colorful lanterns.

Tucked safely in her warm bed, Harper hugged her teddy bear and closed her eyes. She fell asleep with a smile, dreaming of the wonderful surprises her rainbow garden would bring tomorrow.
