AND THE LAST OASIS

A Tale of Environmental Heroes

The Guardians of the Water

Mariyana Kovacheva

High in the mountains, a magical little water droplet named Kapcho lives in a crystal-clear lake. Surrounded by lush green trees and vibrant flowers, he feels the peace of the mountain air. However, Kapcho senses a distant sadness in the waters of the world and decides to embark on a mission to find the Guardians of the Water.

As he begins his journey, Kapcho meets a friendly green frog by the edge of the lake. The frog listens to Kapcho's mission and decides to join him, knowing that water is home to many creatures. Together, they set off down a winding stream, ready to face the world and help those in need.

They arrive at a small village where they see a public tap left wide open, with water pouring out uselessly onto the dusty ground. Kapcho feels a pang of sadness seeing the precious liquid being wasted while no one is around. He explains to his friend that every single drop is vital for life on Earth.

With a determined hop, the frog reaches up and helps Kapcho turn the heavy handle to stop the wasteful flow. They look at each other with satisfaction, knowing they have saved many drops from being lost forever. This small act of care is their first successful step toward protecting the world's water.

Their path leads them to a part of the river that is choked with plastic bottles, discarded paper, and old trash. The water has become murky and grey, hiding the stones and making it hard for any living thing to breathe. Kapcho whispers that people have forgotten how to care for the delicate home of the fish.

Kapcho and the frog work tirelessly together to pull the debris from the water and clear the riverbank. Slowly, the water begins to sparkle again as the sun hits the surface, revealing the beauty beneath. The hidden fish start to peek out from behind the rocks, grateful for their clean and safe home.

Further down the river, they find a garden where the plants are drooping and thirsty under the hot afternoon sun. They notice that while some areas are flooded by wasteful hoses, these poor flowers have been left forgotten and dry. Kapcho realizes that water must be shared wisely so that every living thing has enough to survive.

They encounter a tired little fish struggling in a patch of dirty water and a bear nearby who was worried about the changing forest. After helping the fish move to a clear stream and comforting the forest animals, the friends feel the weight of their journey. The animals remind them that when nature is protected, everyone is safe and happy.

Finally, they reach a bend in the river where a group of children are busy picking up litter and turning off leaking taps. Kapcho realizes with joy that these children are the true Guardians of the Water he was searching for all along. He tells them the story of his journey and the many places that still need their help.

The children listen intently and promise to teach others how to save water and keep the rivers clean. Kapcho looks around at the beautiful, clear river and the happy animals, realizing that every person can be a guardian. He smiles, knowing that by protecting a single drop, we protect the future of the whole world.
