Joana Barroso

Valério, a Roman soldier with a stern but determined face, stands tall in a vibrant camp, his armor gleaming under the Roman sun. He's practicing with his gladius, surrounded by fellow soldiers in various states of training, preparing for a grand mission.

Barges filled with goods and cheerful travelers glide down the wide, sparkling Tiber River, leaving the majestic city of Rome behind. Valério and his comrades stand guard, their watchful eyes scanning the riverbanks as they journey towards the sea.

The bustling port of Ostia explodes with activity, a kaleidoscope of colorful ships, towering lighthouses, and busy warehouses. Merchants haggle, sailors tie ropes, and Valério watches the chaos with a sense of awe before boarding a large merchant vessel.

A sturdy Roman merchant ship with a billowing sail cuts through the calm, blue waters of the Western Mediterranean. Valério stands at the bow, a gentle breeze rustling his hair, as playful dolphins leap alongside the vessel, guiding their way.

In the vibrant city of Barcelona, Roman soldiers clash heroically with invaders, their shields locked in a dynamic defense. Valério, with an exaggerated grunt, helps protect precious cargo and citizens, even as some brave comrades fall.

Valério and his weary but resolute legion travel along a magnificent Roman road, built with sturdy stones, stretching across a scenic landscape. Horse-drawn carriages, brimming with supplies, roll past rolling hills and ancient trees, making their way inland.

Suddenly, in the lively streets of Lisbon, Valério is caught in a surprise attack, his face showing a cartoonish grimace of pain. A loyal comrade swiftly pulls him to safety, dragging him towards a sturdy fortification as the battle rages around them.

Recovering inside a grand Roman fortification in Lisbon, Valério looks out over the bustling city square, the Forum, where citizens debate and merchants trade. He sees magistrates administering justice and people going about their daily lives, a vibrant heart of the city.

Valério enjoys a rare moment of leisure, either laughing heartily at a play in the grand Roman Theatre or relaxing in the warm, steamy baths, surrounded by other citizens. He's making new friends and experiencing the rich culture of Lisbon.

In the vibrant port of Lisbon, Valério stands proudly amidst towering stacks of Garum jars and bustling trade ships. He gazes out at the glittering Tagus River, filled with renewed determination, knowing that the Roman Empire's strength and culture will prevail.
