

The Little Dragon Who Couldn't Lie

Joseph Qa

Once upon a time, in a magical kingdom of green hills and sparkling rivers, lived a little dragon named Ember. Ember had shiny red scales, tiny wings, and a tail that wiggled whenever he was excited. But Ember had an unusual secret: whenever he told a lie, his nose turned bright purple!

One sunny morning, King Aldric announced a grand celebration to welcome spring by ringing the kingdom's magnificent Golden Bell. Ember wanted to feel special and help with the important event. He quietly sneaked into the castle courtyard where the heavy bell rested on a wooden stand.

Determined to show everyone how strong he was, Ember pushed the Golden Bell with his nose. Suddenly, with a loud crash, the bell rolled down the hill, bounced over a bush, and disappeared into the dark forest. Ember froze in terror as he realized what he had done.

When a castle guard ran over and asked if he had seen the bell, Ember panicked and lied, saying he had not seen it. Instantly, his nose turned a glowing, bright purple color. Overwhelmed by shame, Ember covered his face with his claws and flew away to the edge of the forest.

At the forest edge, Ember met Finn, a friendly little fox with a fluffy orange tail. Ember tearfully admitted that he knocked the bell away and lied about it. Finn smiled gently and reminded Ember that everyone makes mistakes, offering to help him find the bell and make things right.

Hand in paw, Ember and Finn bravely stepped into Darkwood Forest. Strange sounds echoed through the tall trees and long shadows, making Ember tremble with fear. Finn encouraged him, explaining that true bravery means moving forward even when you feel scared.

Guided by Olive the wise old owl, the friends found the Golden Bell wedged tightly between two large rocks. Together with a helpful rabbit family, Ember pushed and pulled until the bell popped free. As Ember cheered with joy, his purple nose returned to its normal shiny red color.

Returning to the castle, Ember stood before King Aldric and the gathered villagers to confess the whole truth. He admitted his mistake, explained how afraid he had been, and apologized for lying. King Aldric smiled kindly, praising Ember's courage to take responsibility and fix his mistake.

Ember happily worked alongside Finn and the villagers to polish the Golden Bell until it sparkled like new. That evening, King Aldric handed Ember the rope and invited him to ring the bell for the spring celebration. Ember pulled with all his strength, filling the kingdom with a glorious chime.

Ember learned that telling the truth takes courage, but honesty brings true joy and peace of mind. That night, under a sky full of twinkling stars, the little red dragon curled up in his cozy cave with a warm, happy heart.
