

THE SUN'S LITTLE FRIEND

The Little Plant That Wanted to Grow

Thauan Nilton

A bright and colorful book cover illustration featuring a happy, smiling little seed tucked inside soft brown soil, surrounded by a cheerful garden background.

Deep under the warm, dark earth, a tiny seed with a friendly face named Sprout is waiting patiently. The soil is soft and brown, and the seed looks cozy and hopeful in her underground home.

Gentle blue raindrops fall from a soft cloud onto the brown earth. The tiny seed looks up happily, drinking the cool water and starting to grow a tiny, strong root into the soil.

A big, smiling yellow sun shines brightly in a clear blue sky. The warmth reaches Sprout underground, making her feel cozy and giving her the energy to stretch her tiny green arms upward.

A tiny, bright green sprout with two small, round leaves pops out of the brown soil. The little plant looks around the big, sunny garden with wide, curious eyes and a big smile.

Sprout is now a bit taller with several vibrant green leaves. A colorful butterfly flutters nearby under a bright blue sky, and the little plant looks very happy to be part of the garden.

Some crumpled paper and old cans lie on the ground right next to the little plant. Sprout looks sad and mosey, with her leaves drooping slightly because the trash is making the earth dirty.

A young boy and girl with kind faces and bright clothes are bending down to pick up the trash. They are carefully putting the litter into a bin, making the garden clean and beautiful again.

The two children are using a bright red watering can to give Sprout a fresh drink of clean water. The little plant looks refreshed and is starting to stand up straight and proud again.

Sprout is now a tall, strong, and healthy plant with many lush green leaves. She stands in a beautiful, clean garden with the children smiling and waving happily beside her.
