

Finnegan's Journey to the Stars

Ruthie Matteson

In the heart of the Sapphire Trench lived Finnegan, a tiny sea dragon whose scales glowed with a soft, neon light. While his friends played among the glowing coral, Finnegan often stared up at the faint, flickering lights dancing far above them in the dark water.

One morning, a shimmering silver coin drifted down from the heights and landed softly in the glowing sand. Finnegan picked it up, marveling at how it reflected his own light, and decided it was finally time to see where such treasures came from.

Finnegan began his long swim upward, weaving through giant emerald kelp forests that swayed like underwater trees. The water grew warmer and the deep indigo of the abyss started to turn into a bright, clear turquoise as he ascended.

Along the way, he met Barnaby, an ancient sea turtle with a shell covered in colorful moss and tiny barnacles. Barnaby smiled kindly and told Finnegan to follow the rising bubbles, for they would lead him straight to the mysterious world of air.

Suddenly, a swirling school of silver minnows darted around Finnegan, inviting him to join their fast-paced game of tag. They zipped through the water like streaks of lightning, filling the ocean with a sense of joy and rhythmic movement.

As he climbed higher, the water became so clear that Finnegan could see the sun's rays piercing through the surface like golden spears. He felt a tingle of excitement in his fins, knowing he was closer than he had ever been to the ceiling of his world.

Finnegan reached the very top, where the water met the air in a shimmering, dancing boundary. He took a deep breath and pushed his head through the surface, feeling the cool night breeze on his scales for the very first time.

Above him stretched a vast, dark velvet sky filled with thousands of twinkling stars and a massive, glowing moon. Finnegan gasped in wonder, realizing that the world above was even more beautiful than he had imagined in his deep-sea dreams.

He looked back down into the dark water and saw his own bioluminescent reflection glowing brightly against the rhythmic waves. He realized that the stars in the sky looked just like the glowing creatures in his home, connecting the two worlds in a single tapestry of light.

With a heart full of stories, Finnegan dived back down into the deep, eager to tell his friends about the magic he found above. He realized that while the stars were magnificent, the warm glow of his coral home was the most special place of all.
