

Leo's Colorful Words at Ag-agama

Mariel Pangulo

Bright morning sun shines down on the cheerful colorful playground of Ag-agama Elementary School as children arrive for a brand new day of learning. Six-year-old Leo stands near the entrance wearing his favorite blue backpack and waving happily to his teacher. He is excited to share something very special with his classmates today.

Inside the cozy first-grade classroom, Leo sits at his wooden desk and listens as the teacher asks everyone about the special words they use at home. Leo raises his hand high into the air with a big smile on his face. He is ready to talk about the language his family speaks together after school.

Leo stands in front of the classroom holding a colorful drawing of his living room where his grandmother is telling him stories. He proudly shares a warm greeting in his first language, teaching his friends how to say hello. The other students repeat the new word with delighted grins, trying out the gentle sounds.

During art time, Leo draws his favorite neighborhood street and points out the special name painted on the corner sign. He explains to his tablemates that the street name comes from his family's heritage and means a field of blooming wildflowers. His friends lean in close, fascinated by the pretty sounds and meaning of the local landmark.

At lunchtime, Leo opens his shiny red lunchbox and reveals a steaming container of delicious homemade dumplings wrapped in a cozy cloth. He shares the traditional cultural name of the food with his best friend sitting right beside him. They marvel at how names for delicious meals can sound so wonderfully different around the world.

In the school library, Leo and his classmates flip through large picture maps of their town to find places named after different languages and cultures. Leo spots a familiar word on the map and excitedly taps the page with his finger. The librarian smiles warmly and tells the children how words travel across oceans to shape their hometown.

During recess on the grassy school field, Leo and his friends play a fun matching game using greeting words from everyone's home languages. They laugh and clap their hands together every time someone learns a new phrase correctly. The playground fills with friendly sounds and cheerful voices celebrating their diverse backgrounds.

Back inside the classroom, the children sit in a circle on the colorful reading rug to create a special friendship wall chart. Leo carefully writes down his favorite word from his first language on a paper leaf and colors it bright green. He glues his leaf proudly onto the big poster next to words from all his classmates.

The afternoon sun casts a golden glow through the tall classroom windows as the teacher praises the children for sharing their unique cultural treasures. Leo looks around the room at the smiling faces of his friends who now know a little bit of his language. His heart feels warm and full of pride for his family and his wonderful school.

The school bell rings cheerfully at the end of the day, signaling the start of the walk home from Ag-agama Elementary School. Leo skips down the sidewalk with his backpack bouncing, happily greeting neighbors in both of his favorite languages. The world around him feels bigger, brighter, and wonderfully connected through the power of words.
