

Krishna's Wisdom for Arjuna

Akilan Jega

Arjuna sits in his magnificent chariot, his brow furrowed with worry. The vast battlefield stretches out before him, filled with countless warriors. He feels a heavy sadness in his heart, unsure of what to do.

He points across the field, seeing his beloved cousins and teachers among the opposing army. A tear rolls down his cheek, thinking of fighting those he loves. His hands tremble on his mighty bow.

Beside him, Krishna, with a gentle smile and a peacock feather in his crown, turns to him. "My dear Arjuna," he asks softly, "why does your brave heart feel so troubled today?"

Arjuna looks at Krishna, his eyes filled with despair. "How can I fight against my own family and friends, O Krishna?" he laments. "I do not wish to win a kingdom at such a terrible cost."

Krishna places a comforting hand on Arjuna's shoulder. He begins to speak in a calm, soothing voice, explaining the importance of duty. He tells Arjuna that some things are bigger than personal feelings.

"The spirit within us is eternal, Arjuna, it never truly perishes," Krishna explains with a wise gaze. "Bodies may change, but the soul continues its journey." This thought brings a little light to Arjuna's face.

He encourages Arjuna to perform his duty as a warrior with a pure heart, without attachment to the outcome. "Do your best, act with kindness, and trust in the path of dharma," Krishna advises.

Arjuna listens intently, his sadness slowly giving way to understanding. He begins to grasp the deeper meaning of Krishna's words. A small spark of resolve ignites within him.

Krishna's smile broadens, radiating warmth and wisdom. "Always remember, Arjuna, doing what is right, even when it's hard, brings true peace," he assures him. "Your actions matter."

With a renewed sense of purpose, Arjuna grips his bow firmly, his face now calm and determined. He looks at Krishna, filled with gratitude and courage, ready to face his destiny.
