

Omar's Slippers and the Sparkling Dates

Baile Twoma

RAMADAN

Little Omar loves to run and jump under the warm desert sun, but he is not very good at listening to instructions. He often giggles and runs away, leaving his bright blue slippers scattered on the floor instead of putting them away properly.

His mother kindly points to the shelf by the door, reminding him that keeping things tidy is an important part of their day. She explains that being organized shows respect for their home, especially when it is time for the family to prepare for prayer.

While his family enters the beautiful mosque for prayer, Omar stays outside to play with his small toy camel in the soft, golden sand. He enjoys the quiet afternoon, but he feels a little lonely watching his family go inside together.

The next day, Omar rushes into the house to get a drink of water and suddenly trips over his own messy slippers. He falls onto the cool tiles with a surprised look, realizing that his own untidiness has caused him to stumble.

A Father's Promise

His father gently helps him up and asks if he is okay, offering a comforting hand and a warm smile. Omar rubs his sore knee and looks down at the slippers on the floor, thinking deeply about what happened.

Omar stands by the door, looking thoughtfully at his bright blue slippers lying right in the middle of the walkway. He realizes that his mother was right all along about the importance of keeping their home tidy and safe for everyone.

With a small, proud smile, Omar picks up his slippers and places them neatly on the wooden shelf. He feels a wonderful sense of accomplishment as they sit perfectly in their place next to his father's prayer beads.

Later that evening, Omar decides to help his mother set the table for their family meal. He carefully carries a bowl of sweet dates and glasses of fresh milk to the table, wanting to be as helpful as possible.

A Story of Generations

His mother smiles warmly and gives him extra dates as a special reward for being so helpful and for listening so well. The dates glisten in the light like tiny, sweet jewels, tasting better than any Omar has ever had before.

From that day on, Omar always remembers to put his things away with a happy and helpful heart. He walks hand-in-hand with his father toward the mosque, knowing that listening and helping makes him the happiest boy of all.
