

A Day Without the Internet

Ahmed Mohamed

Leo woke up early on Saturday morning, stretching sleepily as the morning sunlight streamed through his bedroom window. Eager to check his favorite online games and chat with his friends, he reached for his tablet on the bedside table. To his utter confusion, the screen displayed a frustrating error message: No Internet Connection. He tapped the screen repeatedly, but the loading icon just kept spinning endlessly, signaling the start of a very different kind of day.

Sitting at his messy wooden desk, Leo stared blankly at his history assignment. Without search engines, he could not look up key historical dates, and his messaging apps remained completely dead. He tried texting his classmates for help, but the messages failed to send with a little red exclamation mark. Frustrated and restless, he realized he was entirely cut off from his digital world and had to figure out how to finish his homework on his own.

Hearing delicious cooking smells drift into the hallway, Leo wandered downstairs into the kitchen where his mom was preparing lunch. Instead of rushing back to his room with his phone, he sat down at the kitchen table and started chatting with her about her favorite childhood memories. His dad joined in shortly after, and they spent the afternoon playing an old board game together, laughing loudly and discovering how much fun they could have without screens.

Later in the afternoon, Leo met up with his friends at the neighborhood football field for a casual match. Running across the green grass under the warm sun made him forget all about his earlier frustrations with the Wi-Fi. During a fast-paced play, Leo tried to kick the ball hard toward the goal, but he completely missed and tripped over his own shoelaces, landing face-first in the grass while his friends burst into helpless laughter.

As the evening sky turned a soft shade of orange and purple, Leo walked back home feeling tired but strangely satisfied. Just as he stepped through the front door, his phone suddenly buzzed with a flood of notifications as the home internet finally reconnected. Instead of immediately diving back into his online games, Leo smiled, placed his phone quietly on the desk, and realized that real life had a lot of offline adventures waiting to be explored.

Scene 6 content

Scene 7 content

Scene 8 content

Scene 9 content

Scene 10 content