

The Great Roblox Rescue

Ma. Corazon Dioso

Leo was peacefully napping in his cozy bedroom, dreaming of floating on fluffy clouds under a warm afternoon sun. Suddenly, a deafening shriek pierced through the quiet house, shattering the silence completely. He jolted awake in absolute shock, wondering if a dragon had just landed on their roof.

He leaped out of bed and rushed into the hallway to find his little sister Lily sobbing uncontrollably. Her face was red and tears streamed down her cheeks like tiny waterfalls. Leo panicked, his protective big-brother instincts kicking in instantly as he asked what had happened.

Between heavy sobs, Lily managed to gasp out that some mean classmates had been bullying her. Leo's eyes flashed with fierce determination as he clenched his fists tightly. He knew he had to act fast to defend his sister's honor and make those bullies pay.

Determined to be her ultimate hero, Leo imagined himself moving at the speed of sound just like Sonic the Hedgehog. He burst out of the front door and sprinted down the suburban sidewalk with a trail of imaginary blue light behind him. Wind whipped through his hair as he dashed toward the neighborhood school at lightning speed.

After an intense sprint, Leo finally skidded to a halt right in front of the school gates, breathing heavily and bracing himself for a showdown. But to his utter bewilderment, the playground was completely empty, silent, and locked up tight. A bright banner fluttered in the breeze, reminding everyone of the weekend.

A friendly passing neighbor walked by and casually reminded him that today was actually Saturday, meaning no classes were in session. Leo blinked in confusion, wiping the sweat from his forehead as his heroic adrenaline slowly faded into pure bewilderment. If school was closed, where had the bullies come from?

Realization began to dawn on him, making him scratch his head in total puzzlement as he turned around to jog back home. He retraced his steps much more slowly this time, wondering what kind of mystery he had just stumbled into. The frantic sprint now felt a bit silly in the quiet morning light.

When he burst back through the front door, panting and out of breath, he found Lily sitting comfortably on the living room rug. She was holding a glowing tablet in her hands, her eyes glued to the bright, colorful screen. There was no schoolyard in sight, only a digital world full of blocky characters and floating platforms.

Leo peered over her shoulder and finally understood the whole dramatic mystery of the morning. Lily wasn't at school at all; she was playing her favorite game on Roblox, and some other online players had been teasing her inside the virtual chat. The epic crisis turned out to be a digital adventure in a pixelated universe.

Leo let out a long sigh of relief mixed with a chuckle, realizing his super-speed dash was totally unnecessary yet completely sweet. He sat down right beside Lily on the floor, ready to help her level up and defeat the digital meanies together. After all, protecting his sister was a full-time job, whether in the real world or inside a video game.
