

The Little Dragon Who Learned to Share

Pradeep Kumar

Spark, a cute baby green dragon with big sparkling eyes, small wings, and a curly tail, happily bounces his bright red ball in a sunny green valley filled with colorful flowers. He loves his ball more than anything.

His friends, a fluffy white bunny, a clever red fox, and a colorful blue bird, peek from behind a big tree, watching Spark play. They wish they could join in the fun.

When the bunny hops closer, asking to play, Spark clutches his red ball tightly to his chest. "Mine!" he chirps, shaking his head with a determined frown.

The bunny, fox, and bird look sad, their ears drooping, and gently turn to walk away, leaving Spark alone in the vast green field.

Spark continues to bounce his ball, but his big sparkling eyes start to droop, and his friendly smile fades. Playing alone isn't as much fun anymore.

He sits by himself under the big tree, the red ball forgotten beside him, feeling a deep pang of loneliness in his little dragon heart.

Suddenly, Spark gets an idea! A bright smile returns to his face as he picks up his red ball and zooms off to find his friends.

He finds his friends resting by a stream and joyfully offers the red ball. "Want to play?" he asks, his tail wiggling with excitement.

The bunny, fox, and bird cheer with delight!
They all take turns bouncing and chasing the bright red ball together, laughing happily.

Spark, his friends, and the red ball are all piled together in a joyful, giggling group hug, surrounded by sunshine and flowers. Sharing made their day extra special! The End.
