

The Wobbly Worksite

Kathleen Lopez

Foreman Fred stood at the edge of the construction site, holding his blueprints with a puzzled look on his face. He didn't realize he was holding the drawings upside down, making the new skyscraper look like a giant ice cream cone. The crew of trucks waited eagerly for his first command, unaware of the silly day ahead.

Big Blue the Dump Truck backed up to the main pit with a loud beep-beep-beep. Instead of heavy gravel, a mountain of giant, fluffy pink marshmallows tumbled out of his bed. The workers stared in shock as the site suddenly looked like a sugary wonderland, and a few seagulls began to circle overhead.

Mixy the Cement Mixer started his engine, but he began to spin much faster than usual. Instead of pouring flat concrete, he created a giant, swirling grey soft-serve swirl that towered over the workers. Foreman Fred scratched his head, wondering if they were building a parking garage or a giant dessert.

A family of mischievous squirrels climbed onto the hook of the giant crane, operated by a very surprised worker named Barnaby. As the crane swung through the air, the squirrels began to juggle the workers' colorful hard hats. The sky was filled with flying yellow, red, and blue hats while the crew scrambled to catch them.

Flattening Phil the Steamroller tried to help clear the lunch area, but he was a bit too enthusiastic. He rolled right over the picnic table, turning the crew's thick ham sandwiches into paper-thin snacks. The workers laughed as they peeled their flattened lunches off the ground like stickers.

Excavator Ernie dug deep into the earth, hoping to find a solid foundation for the elevator shaft. Suddenly, his metal bucket hit something soft and squeaky instead of a rock. He pulled up a giant yellow rubber duck that had been buried years ago, and it let out a loud squeak that echoed across the site.

It was time to paint the main support beams, but a sudden gust of wind caught the sprayers. Instead of a professional grey finish, the entire building was covered in bright rainbow stripes and polka dots. The construction site looked less like an office building and more like a giant birthday present.

During their afternoon break, the trucks decided to play a game of hide-and-seek. Tiny the Bulldozer tried to hide behind a single skinny lamppost, convinced that no one could see his massive yellow frame. The workers giggled as they walked right past him, pretending he was completely invisible.

As the sun began to set, the building was finally finished, but it looked very different from the original plan. Because of the upside-down blueprints, the workers had built a giant slide instead of a staircase. Foreman Fred took the first ride down, cheering all the way to the bottom while the trucks honked their horns.

The moon rose over the wobbly worksite, and the tired trucks tucked themselves into their garages. Foreman Fred hung up his dusty vest, proud of his team and their very unique building. It wasn't the tallest skyscraper in the city, but it was certainly the only one with a marshmallow foundation and a rainbow roof.
