Gael Gonzalez

Ms. Amara steps through the doorway, her colorful scarf trailing behind her as she catches her breath with a warm, knowing smile. The classroom hums with the excited whispers of two dozen girls who have been eagerly awaiting her arrival. Sunlight streams through the large windows, illuminating the stacks of books and art supplies ready for the day's adventure.

A Shared Sadness

Standing before the chalkboard, Ms. Amara opens a worn leather notebook, her eyes sparkling with the secret of today's lesson. The girls lean forward in their seats, their diverse faces reflecting a mix of curiosity and pure joy as the first words of the story fill the air. Every hand is ready to reach for the stars, and every heart is open to the wonders of discovery.

By the end of the morning, the room is a whirlwind of creativity, with colorful drawings and handwritten poems covering every desk. Ms. Amara kneels beside a young girl to admire her work, sharing a quiet moment of encouragement that lights up the student's face. In this classroom, every girl knows she is seen, she is capable, and she is destined for greatness.
