

Leo's Safe Classroom Choices

Diana Sterritt - Parkholme School (2593)

Leo loves walking into his bright and colorful classroom every single morning to start a fun day of learning. Sometimes, when he steps inside the room, he feels a strong urge to take off his shoes. He might want to feel the cool floor or just wiggle his toes freely in the cozy space.

If Leo decides he does not want to wear his shoes anymore, the best and safest place for them is neatly tucked inside his designated cubby. Placing them gently on the shelf ensures they are out of the way and ready for later. This simple routine keeps the classroom tidy and helps Leo stay organized.

However, sometimes Leo forgets about his cubby and feels the sudden urge to pick up his shoes and throw them across the room. He might watch them sail through the air and think the sudden movement looks silly or exciting. But throwing things inside the classroom changes the peaceful environment into an unpredictable space.

When a shoe flies through the air, it can surprise the other children and make them feel scared or worried. Instead of laughing, his classmates step back and look away with uncomfortable expressions. Throwing objects is not a game, and people around him do not think it is funny at all.

Teacher Sarah walks over with a calm and gentle expression to talk about what just happened. She kneels down to Leo's eye level to help him understand how his actions affect the people sharing the room. Good communication helps Leo learn better ways to express his big feelings.

Teacher Sarah gently explains that shoes are heavy and unpredictable when they fly through the air. If a flying shoe accidentally hits another student, it can cause real physical pain and make them cry. Keeping objects in our hands means everyone stays safe from unexpected bumps.

Leo sits quietly for a moment and starts to understand the important message Teacher Sarah is sharing. He realizes that his friends need to feel safe and comfortable while they play and learn together. Caring about other people means making choices that keep everyone out of harm's way.

The next morning, Leo walks through the classroom door and pauses to think about the best way to start his day. He remembers yesterday's lesson and decides he wants to take care of his shoes properly. He bends down with a focused look on his face, ready to make a positive choice.

Instead of letting his shoes fly, Leo picks them up carefully and carries them straight to his cubby. He places them neatly side by side on the wooden shelf where they belong. A proud smile spreads across his face as he completes the helpful routine all by himself.

Teacher Sarah notices Leo's wonderful choice and gives him a warm, encouraging thumbs-up and a bright smile. His classmates feel happy and safe playing nearby in the calm and welcoming classroom. Leo feels proud of himself for making a safe choice and being a great friend.
