

Flo and the Star of Light

Luana Mantuano

Flo was a cheerful little firefly who flew through the evening breeze, proud of her warm, golden tail light. But one chilly night, as she flickered near the town square, her bright light suddenly blinked out, leaving her tail dark and cold.

Dismayed and terrified of the dark, Flo flew through the quiet city streets with tears in her eyes. She searched under streetlamps, around glowing shop windows, and across quiet alleyways, hoping to find her missing glow anywhere she could.

Determined to glow again, Flo spotted a shiny yellow marble sitting on a cobblestone path. She tried to attach it to her tail, but it was far too heavy and kept falling off into the grass, making her tumble.

Next, Flo found a tiny festive fairy-light bulb resting in a flower garden. She carefully tried to slip into it, but it was much too tight and uncomfortably squeezed her, making it impossible for her to flap her wings.

Flo then tried using a tiny fragment of polished glass that caught the reflection of city lanterns. But no matter how she held it, the piece was far too loose and offered only a cold, artificial glimmer without any real warmth.

Exhausted and discouraged, Flo sat on the edge of a high brick rooftop, resting her head on her knees while soft tears fell. Every substitute light she tried was either too big, too small, too tight, or completely cold.

High up in the midnight sky, a kind and gentle star named Lina noticed the sorrowful little firefly crying on the roof. Lina floated down through the night sky like a soft ribbon of radiant silver light.

Lina landed gently beside Flo and offered a comforting smile, asking if she could help create a special light for Flo's tail. Flo nodded eagerly as Lina gathered a flickering spark of pure starlight and placed it tenderly on Flo's tail.

The glowing starlight fit Flo perfectly, blooming into a breathtaking, cozy warmth that brightened her entire spirit. Overjoyed, Flo danced through the air alongside Lina, their lights twirling together in pure harmony.

Flo learned that we do not need to force things that do not fit when we are struggling, because true light and comfort come from kindness and friendship. From that night on, Flo and Lina remained inseparable best friends, lighting up the darkness together.
