PUNE TECHNO-THRILLER

In a sterile, cold Moscow laboratory in 1987, young Viktor Petrov studies a glowing vial of Project Nadezhda. The harsh fluorescent lights hum as he contemplates the terrifying potential of rewriting the human brain through biochemical intervention.

As the Soviet Union begins to crumble in 1989, Viktor frantically packs his research and secret notebooks into a worn suitcase. He looks at a job offer from India, a distant hope for a new life far from the reach of the collapsing empire.

Years later in the vibrant city of Pune, Aarav Sharma works in a dimly lit room filled with wires and circuit boards. His hands move with unnatural precision, fixing a complex device that seems to speak to him in patterns of light and logic.

While walking through a crowded market, Aarav suddenly sees the world differently, as if a veil has been lifted. Every movement, every conversation, and every mechanical sound translates into a vivid stream of data that he processes in a heartbeat.

Aarav meets Zara, a determined journalism student, in a quiet cafe to discuss a series of strange technical failures at NovaSpark Tech. Her passion for the truth sparks a flicker of recognition in Aarav, who senses a deeper connection to her dangerous investigation.

Deep within his father's old study, Aarav discovers a hidden compartment containing dusty Soviet journals written in Viktor's precise handwriting. The diagrams of neural pathways and chemical formulas mirror the very sensations Aarav has experienced his entire life.

The shadow of the system grows long as DCP Sanjay Doiphode and corporate tycoon Imran Hussain meet in a high-rise office overlooking the city. They view Aarav not as a young man, but as a variable that must be controlled or eliminated to protect their interests.

Tragedy strikes when Aarav's friend Krissy is caught in the crossfire of a corporate raid gone wrong. Holding his injured friend in the pouring rain, Aarav feels the cold weight of his father's legacy and the heavy cost of staying silent.

Aarav confronts his father, Viktor, under the flickering lights of their home, demanding the truth about his origins. Viktor looks at his son with a mixture of pride and profound regret, realizing the threshold they have both crossed can never be uncrossed.

Standing on a rooftop overlooking the sprawling lights of Pune, Aarav looks at a small, sophisticated device he has built. He understands now that he is the bridge between two worlds, and he chooses to use his enhanced mind to tear down the walls of the corrupt system.
