

Snow White and the Goblin War

Mu Ryan

Once upon a time, in a kingdom nestled beside a whispering forest, lived Snow White. She was known for her kindness and her radiant smile that could brighten even the gloomiest day. One morning, a frantic messenger arrived, his face pale with fear.

The messenger reported that a horde of goblins, led by the grumpy Grungle, were marching towards the kingdom! They were stealing pies, painting mustaches on statues, and generally causing chaos. Snow White knew she had to do something.

Snow White gathered her friends: the seven dwarfs, each with their own special skill. Doc brought his potions, Grumpy his grumpy but surprisingly effective battle cries, and Happy his endless supply of sunshine to lift their spirits.

They ventured into the forest, the dwarfs leading the way, their axes glinting in the dappled sunlight. Snow White, with her unwavering resolve, walked at the front, her heart filled with determination.

They soon encountered the goblins, a motley crew of green-skinned mischief-makers armed with slingshots and stolen kitchen utensils. Grungle, a particularly large and scowling goblin, stood at their head.

The battle began! Doc threw a potion that made the goblins slip on banana peels. Grumpy yelled so loudly that some goblins ran away in fright. Happy sang a song so catchy that some goblins started dancing instead of fighting.

Snow White, using her quick wit and agility, dodged the goblin's attacks. She noticed Grungle was particularly fond of shiny objects. An idea sparked in her mind.

Snow White quickly gathered some berries and polished them until they gleamed. She tossed them towards Grungle, who was instantly distracted, forgetting all about the battle.

The other goblins, seeing their leader captivated by the shiny berries, lost their enthusiasm for fighting. They began arguing about who would get the berries next, their chaotic energy turning inward.

With the goblins distracted, Snow White and her friends led them away from the kingdom, towards a field of wildflowers where they could play and forget about causing trouble. The kingdom was safe, thanks to Snow White's bravery and her friends' unique talents!
