

The Legend of Lord Krishna: The Divine Protector

satynarayan Ora

King Kansa sits upon his golden throne in the grand palace of Mathura, his face twisted with arrogance and power. His soldiers stand guard as he declares his absolute rule, unaware that his destiny is about to change forever.

During the wedding procession of Devaki and Vasudev, a thunderous voice echoes from the darkened skies. The prophecy warns the tyrant Kansa that the eighth son of his sister will be the cause of his ultimate destruction.

Deep within the cold, stone walls of the Mathura prison, Devaki and Vasudev sit in chains under the watchful eyes of guards. Despite the darkness and their sorrow, they hold onto a flicker of hope for the divine child promised to them.

At the stroke of midnight, a brilliant, celestial light illuminates the prison cell as Lord Krishna is born. The divine infant appears with four arms holding sacred symbols before transforming into a beautiful, innocent baby.

Vasudev carries the newborn Krishna in a wicker basket upon his head, stepping out of the prison as the heavy iron gates miraculously unlock. The guards fall into a deep, supernatural sleep, allowing the father and son to escape into the rainy night.

Amidst a fierce storm, Vasudev wades through the raging waters of the Yamuna River. The mighty serpent Sheshnag emerges from the depths, spreading his many hoods like an umbrella to protect the infant Lord from the torrential rain.

In the peaceful village of Gokul, Vasudev quietly enters the home of Nanda and Yashoda. He gently places baby Krishna beside the sleeping Yashoda, fulfilling the divine plan to keep the child safe from Kansa's reach.

The wicked demoness Putana, sent by Kansa to harm the children of Gokul, lies defeated in her true, towering monstrous form. The infant Krishna remains unharmed, crawling playfully in the dust of the courtyard as the villagers look on in awe.

Mother Yashoda asks little Krishna to open his mouth to check if he has been eating dirt. As he obeys, she is stunned to see the entire universe—shining stars, swirling galaxies, and vast oceans—contained within the small child.

Young Krishna leaps into the poisonous depths of the Yamuna River to subdue the multi-headed serpent Kaliya. He emerges triumphantly, dancing upon the serpent's hoods while playing his flute, bringing peace back to the waters of Gokul.
