

Luma's Little Light

by Khofax

Luma was a tiny star, lost in the vastness of the night sky. Around her, other stars blazed brilliantly, their light reaching far and wide. She wished she could shine as brightly, but her glow always felt small and insignificant.

Luma often hid near the edges of the universe, watching the other stars. They boasted about their size and the distance their light traveled. She longed to be noticed, but her shy light barely glimmered.

Below, in a cozy forest village, a young girl named Mira gazed at the stars each night. She loved the twinkling lights, finding beauty in every tiny spark that shimmered above her home. She wished she could reach out and touch them.

One night, Luma noticed Mira looking up at her, and a magical thread of starlight reached out. A tiny ray of Luma's light touched Mira's window, filling her heart with a gentle sense of hope and wonder.

The other stars continued to boast and outshine each other, their lights competing in the sky. But Luma's soft glow, connecting to Mira, quietly persisted, a constant beacon in the vast darkness.

Every night, Luma's light guided Mira as she drew. Mira filled her pages with colorful stars, each drawing making her heart shine with joy and sparking her imagination. Luma was filled with a sense of purpose.
