

Ronan's Rainbow Adventures

by Kelly VanSkiver

Ronan, a bright-eyed boy with blond hair and blue eyes, bounced into Orchard View Kindergarten, his backpack bouncing with him. He loved everything, especially the colorful world around him. Today, his eyes landed on a box of shiny new crayons, a rainbow of possibilities.

Ms. Kinsley, his kind teacher with brown hair, smiled as Ronan grabbed a red crayon. Before she could say a word, he popped it into his mouth. "Yummy!" he exclaimed, his face smudged with color.

Suddenly, Belle, the school's golden retriever with a bright red bandana, trotted over, wagging her tail. She nudged Ronan gently with her nose, as if trying to tell him something. Ms. Kinsley knelt down, explaining that crayons are for drawing, not eating.

Ronan, intrigued, looked at the crayon, then at Belle, who gave a little woof. Ms. Kinsley showed him how to draw a big, beautiful sun on his paper. Ronan, with a newfound understanding, started scribbling happily.

During playtime, Ronan spotted a glue stick and remembered his past habit. He reached for it, but then remembered Belle's gentle nudges and Ms. Kinsley's words. Instead, he decided to use the glue for a creative art project.

At the end of the day, Ronan, covered in paint and smiles, gave Belle a big hug. He learned that while the world is full of tempting things, some are better for looking at and creating with. He knew that the best adventures were the safe ones.
