

Peter Fundog and the Plastic Bag

by Morne Leander

In the clear, blue waters off the coast of Port Elizabeth lived a bright, cheerful jellyfish named Peter Fundog. Peter loved exploring his home, the ocean, and dancing with the waves. One day, while swimming, he found himself trapped.

Peter was stuck! A large plastic bag, filled with heavy rocks, had snared him. He flapped his tentacles frantically, trying to escape, but the bag held him tight. Peter felt scared and alone in the vast ocean.

He struggled with all his might, but the rocks weighed him down. He tried to push, pull, and wiggle free, but his efforts were in vain. Peter sighed, his hope dwindling as he felt his energy fading away.

Suddenly, a large, green turtle appeared. Peter was initially frightened, but the turtle swam closer, its eyes curious. The turtle seemed to be examining the bag Peter was trapped in.

Thinking the bag was a tasty treat, the turtle began to eat it. With each bite, the plastic bag began to disappear, freeing Peter from his prison! Peter was so happy to be free!

The turtle, confused, looked at Peter and then at the water. It swam away, a little perplexed by what it thought it saw. Peter, now safe and sound, understood that kindness can save the day.
